The Gilded Age: 1865-1900

1. Why did the US Civil War stimulate the US Industrial Revolution?
- Better means of capital mobilization were achieved through governmental institutions.
 - The greater demand of the Union Army for weapons, ammunition, clothing and transport encouraged the establishment of banks, which were owned by major forces of capital, to raise to fund the creation of such facilities.
 - Once these facilities were operating, new methods of efficient production and distribution were revealed which were still available to the US economy after the war ended.
 - The introduction of paper currency, known as greenbacks, in 1862 led to the improvement of the US banking system in order to manage the larger sum of money circulating within the economy, allowing the expansion of US industry.
 - The US Civil War facilitated the creation of the New York Stock Exchange and rail routes, which created businesses to cater to the war economy.
 - By 1870, it was taking over 60 days to transport goods from the west coast to the east coast, leading to the creation of the transcontinental railroad.
 - The US Civil War saw the utilization of import tariffs and taxes, which forced foreign firms to supply domestic goods that foreign products, generating domestic businesses exponentially and making them mandatory.
 - Advances from the US Civil War helped America with a new workforce that did not require training and had greater efficient means of capital mobilization.
 - The abandonment of the USA and the American Dream in Europe resulted in an influx of immigrants in search of a better life, which contributed to the rise of the labor unions and the emergence of trusts in 1882.
 - Western industrialization concerning industry during the US Civil War led to the rise of efficiency transport systems, machines, fuel and medical help to the battlefield and war zones. Businesses used the vehicles to transport war
