We really appreciate you being a customer. We're here for you anytime. I have bet on many sports and some other prop bets. The website is easy to use. I do wish there was an app to make it even easier. The fees associated with cashing out are somewhat high. Will Wales captain Sam Warburton struggle to lift the Six Nations trophy this year? Photograph: David Davies/PA The England players and RFU staff were warned earlier this week that they can no longer place bets on any rugby matches. They shouldn't be too concerned about losing money in the next few weeks. The odds for an England victory in the Six Nations are fairly short. The bookies have England as narrow favourites ahead of France, Ireland, Wales and Scotland. If you really want to test credulity, Italy are available at 500-1 with some bookmakers. The Six Nations is fairly open this year. England have momentum after beating New Zealand in the autumn, a win that Matt Dawson called "maybe England's greatest ever victory at Twickenham". "I've been to every single England game at Twickenham since I was 14," he said. "And this was by far the best game I've seen." Dawson's excitement was understandable, but New Zealand were weakened by illness and Stuart Lancaster's team should not be over-confident ahead of away fixtures in Dublin and Cardiff. France are second favourites but not even their coach, Philippe Saint-André, can predict how they will fare in the tournament. "The big problem for French rugby is consistency. On our best day we can beat the best in the world, on our worst we can lose to anyone." France were impressive in the autumn internationals, but they have three away games - at the Stadio Olimpico, Twickenham and the Aviva Stadium - and will need Frédéric Michalak to play to his potential. If Ireland can make the most of a favourable draw, they could be worth an outside bet. France and England have to visit Dublin, where Argentina were demolished in November. Jonathan Sexton starred in that game and with Craig Gilroy on the wing and Brian O'Driscoll able to concentrate on leading the team by example rather than with the armband, Ireland cannot be ruled out. Ireland's first match will be pivotal. They travel to Wales on Saturday lunchtime for the tournament's opening fixture. Wales have struggled since winning the grand slam last year, but they still have enough talent to cause a few shocks in this tournament. A home win against Ireland at the Millennium Stadium could set up a timely return to form. Sam Warburton has said his team's performances have dipped due to a lack of confidence, but a win on the opening day could turn things around. Scotland suffered a poor autumn, lost at home to Tonga in their last fixture of 2012 and are without a permanent coach. Things could be better. They can look forward to three home games, but not even their interim coach, Scott Johnson, sounds convinced: "We've got to work hard on the things we need to improve before we start chasing rainbows," he said. "There's a lot of contact, a lot of defence in this game, and if we don't get that right the scoreboard will be rattling against us. As long as we get a side that gets out there and competes. If we do that, and we prepare right, Scotland can be proud of the effort and the scoreboard will look after itself." If you put a bet on Italy at 500-1 and it pays out, send some cash this way for the tip. Despite going to Paris with four wins out of four, Wayne Pivac's side are not expected to complete the Grand Slam. However, Wales remain favourites to win the title as a victory alone still might not be enough for France to keep their hopes alive with their rearranged game against Scotland still to come. You can read the permutations for Wales and France here. The other four teams are all playing for pride on Super Saturday. This is how the bookmakers think the games will go in round five: Scotland v Italy It looks like it will be another one-sided game involving Italy as they head to Murrayfield as 26/1 outsiders to get a victory at the ground they last won a Six Nations game back in 2015. Scotland are 1/25 to get their second win of the championship with the draw a remote 100/1 shot. The handicap market gives Scotland a 28-point head start, so it should be a comfortable afternoon for Gregor Townsend's side. Ireland v England After finally turning up in this year's competition with a fine performance against France last time out, 2020 champions England are fancied to take that form to Dublin and finish on a high. They are 7/10 favourites, while Ireland can be backed at 48/29 to make it three wins in a row and the draw is 28/1. It should be close though with the handicap market suggesting a three-point win for England. France v Wales Wales have overcome the odds throughout the Six Nations and they will have to again if they are going to seal a Grand Slam and the title on Saturday. Despite their defeat at Twickenham ending their Grand Slam hopes, France are firm favourites at 3/7 with a Wales win rated at 13/5. The draw is 29/1. Wales are still 5/6 favourites to win the Six Nations though as they head into this fixture with a nine-point lead over France, who have played a game less and are 9/4 for the title. If the handicap market is anything to go by, Wales will narrowly miss out on the losing bonus point they need that could secure the title on Saturday. A defeat by seven points or less could well be enough to finish the job in the Stade de France but bookies are handing France an eight-point head start, suggesting it may be just beyond them. That would lead to a nail-biting wait to see what happens in the rearranged game between France and Scotland on Friday, March 26.
